Download OraDump to CSVThe playwright of the moment Peter Altenberg has been making waves as the leading light of the new wave of German theatrics Last month, when Harald Schmidt of the Venice Biennale asked me to name his choice for the German Pavilion's artist in residence, I was quite surprised to learn that Peter Altenberg was a name that has been popping up quite a lot these days. Even more surprising was the question of why Altenberg, whom I had barely heard of until then, seemed to have such a fast-rising profile (as well as a large following). Altenberg's reputation has been growing ever since the beginning of the year, when he received the prestigious Ambos Prize for playwrighting. He has produced several plays since then, and has also been granted the prestigious Muller-Schmidt Fellowship, allowing him to spend six months in London, where he plans to work on a new play. Altenberg's work is spectacular. He is no stranger to the field of theatre but has never chosen a particular genre. He has written monodramas, verse dramas, comic dramas, and has even made silent movies. He writes about real life, but his dramas are also set in the imaginary worlds of his imagination. One of his most recent works was Altenberg's 'Die Blüten der Rhön', an adaptation of the Thomas Mann short story 'Die phantastische Furtachtigkeit', or 'The Fantastic Gorgonzola'. The play, which is currently on stage in Offenbach, was a collaboration between the Potsdam and Offenbach theatres. The play was written with Braaten in mind, but for now it seems that Altenberg and Braaten are the chosen ones. Under Braaten's direction, this play has developed into a sophisticated opera that excels both artistically and in terms of design. The plot of the play is only a loose outline of Thomas Mann's story. It has been turned into
