Q: google maps api key I'm working with google maps api. I have a problem: when I run my program the map loads OK (only an error appears if I go offline) but later on, in other parts of my program, when trying to run another component that needs to get the location of the user, I get an exception: System.InvalidOperationException: Property or indexer 'Google.Maps.Search.ResultSet.Contains' cannot be assigned to -- it is read only. I've looked it up and this seems to be an issue with running 2 programs against the same google api key. So, I don't know how to fix that... anyone can help me on this, please? A: The answer you got in the comments is a valid one. The exception you get sounds like you are trying to access a property of the google api key that you are not supposed to access. The idea is that you are using the api key to access a google server and not your program code. By looking at the exception you posted, it is clear that you are using the google.maps.places.PlacesService class, and try to use its properties. You can put your code into a static function and give your api key as parameter for that function, in order to get a new instance of the api key. This also answers your question about why the changes you are taking at runtime are not reflected into the map. The api key defines what kind of instance is created so you cant change the api key without using the same kind of instance.
